

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

In a heat exchanger for cooling air, a tube has a streamlined-shaped cross-section so that air flows along an outer surface of the tube without stagnating. Therefore, it is less likely that moisture contained in the air will adhere on the outer surface of the tube. Accordingly, the formation of frost is restricted.